The effects of the immunosuppressive agents bisindolylmaleimide I (BIM-I) and 1-oleoyl-2-acetyl-sn-glycerol (OAG) on protein kinase C (PKC) activity and growth of S49 lymphoma cells were examined. BIM-I (100 nM) caused an 8-10-fold increase in PKC activity. Both BIM-I and OAG caused the accumulation of PKC activity in the particulate fraction in a manner similar to that of phorbol 12-myristate 13-acetate (PMA). BIM-I and OAG also caused an increase in the levels of PKC alpha, beta, and gamma immunoreactive proteins in the particulate fraction. Both BIM-I and OAG caused the accumulation of PKC activity in the particulate fraction and increased PKC activity in a concentration-dependent manner. They also caused a concentration-dependent increase in PKC levels in the particulate fraction. BIM-I and OAG increased the levels of PKC alpha, beta, and gamma immunoreactive proteins in the particulate fraction. Exposure of S49 lymphoma cells to BIM-I for 6 h did not change either the level of PKC alpha in the cytosolic fraction or the level of PKC beta in the particulate fraction. Exposure of cells to OAG for 6 h caused an increase in PKC alpha levels in the cytosolic fraction and an increase in PKC beta and gamma levels in the particulate fraction, but did not change PKC alpha levels in the particulate fraction.
